

US/European Daily Wrap

US 10 year real yields, the $ and Gold core historical drivers of Gold

- Its all about the other markets which are driving Gold. In particular, today, the takeaway was a global repricing higher in yields (led by UK gilts) which topped 0.90% for the first time since May after the BOE opened the door to a 2021 rate hike to contain inflation. That trickled over with US 10yrs reclaiming ~1.40% (amongst other drivers), driving real rates up and simultaneously pressuring Gold as volumes on autopilot grind it lower.
- Gold is doing what it should in the short term – falling, due to: 1) past history following a Fed event (recall yesterdays graph showing its on average down 1% 20days on following a Fed event in '21, but the trend clearly shows any rallies should be capitalized on), 2) higher yields. The correlation between long-term real yields (10yrs yields – 10 yr BreakEvens) is +0.86 but that has waned since the June FOMC when tapering was initially flaunted (chart 2). The model implied gold price with current real 10yr yields, is $1810, but in reality Gold has been trading at approximately a ~$50 discount to where it “should be” (vs real yields) all summer. Thus the comfort level into Q4, with prices closer to $1750 is somewhat fair (all things equal). The bigger threat is if 10yr yields, which are hitting up against some resistance/inflection area, break up & out and the market shifts from a 1.20-1.4% range (associated with Gold $1730-1830) to a 1.4-1.6% range (which could imply lower gold ranges). For now, Gold remains a correlation play contingent on other markets.

- Contagion fears around Evergrande have subsided (it's a Chinese, not global problem, and losses will likely be socialized) even as Chinese authorities signaled reluctance to bail out Evergrande. Beijing has injected more cash into the financial system and regulators instructed the property developer to avoid a near-term default. That, as well the follow-through from the hawkish Fed is playing out positively for US stocks as its confirmation that “substantial progress” has been made (good news is now good for risk assets). Macro fear continues to be incredibly short-lived...
